Greater New York's Golden Anniversary

With a Selected List of Books Relating to New York City

By CLEVELAND RODGERS and REBECCA B. RANKIN

NEW YORK is one of the most written about cities in the world. According to I. N. Phelps Stokes' Iconography of Manhattan Island, 1498-1909, published in six volumes from 1915-1928 and generally accepted as the most comprehensive and scholarly local history, there were, at that time, well over ten thousand books on the metropolis in The New York Public Library, and twice that many titles in existence. Another twenty years of publishing has added many more books about New York. And yet now when we are to celebrate its Golden Anniversary in 1948, we find a paucity of printed material about the past fifty years since consolidation as Greater New York.

A number of institutions devote a considerable part of their efforts to accumulating records about this metropolis. The New York Public Library and the New-York Historical Society stand at the head of this list with large collections of manuscripts and secondary sources devoted to New York City. The Long Island Historical Society and the Staten Island Historical Society confine their accessions to those sections of the city. The Brooklyn and Queens Borough public libraries have good collections of local histories in their central buildings; and the Hudson Park Branch and the Municipal Reference Library of The New York Public Library are depositories of the best books on New York City. Columbia University Library, The New York Society Library, and Russell Sage Foundation Library possess equally good local history collections. The libraries of the museums of the City and Cooper Union have smaller holdings.

From these institutions many bibliographies have been issued from time to time, and yet none is now available which is up-to-date or can serve as a good reading list for the historical background of Greater New York from 1898 to 1948. To meet the need for such a list we have prepared a bibliography for those who wish to know more or to review the history of New York during its most recent fifty years.

The list printed below is principally of books, and does not include periodical articles or pamphlets. We have selected those books which are usually available in public libraries or for purchase from publishers. Official documents have been included when they are needed to fill in a gap not covered by a more popular book. Naturally, we consider biography as important and include some individual and collective biographies. There are also some guidebooks and descriptive books containing important or difficult to obtain bits of history. We have purposely omitted historical fiction.

This selection of one hundred and fifty books has been made from the entire collection of the Municipal Reference Library in Room 2230 Municipal Building, Manhattan, a branch of The New York Public Library maintained for City officials and employees and citizens. In that library the documents and official records of the City covering three hundred years are supplemented by local history and biography, and all literature relating to the City's government and activities. The authors have drawn on these resources for the story of the development of the City from a colonial trading post to a world capital, emphasizing the past fifty years of Greater New York.

This bibliography will be appended to a new book, New York: The World's Capital City; Its Development and Contributions to Progress, by Cleveland Rodgers, City Planning Commissioner, New York, and Rebecca B. Rankin, Librarian of New York's Municipal Reference Library to be published in the spring of 1948 by Harper and Brothers, and is preprinted here with the authors' permission.

One object in compiling this list is to aid citizens and students whose interest may be stimulated by the Golden Anniversary which will be celebrated in 1948 beginning in June and continued through September, as planned by the Mayor's Golden Anniversary Committee.
